| 3.5 | The news that Bo, a language from the Andaman islands, has finally died out, will upset many professional linguists. There are many critically endangered languages among the 7,000 or so that still exist, and they are dying at a rate of one every couple of weeks. Language death is, sadly, not all that unusual. The loss of Bo, the endangered language from the Andaman is a tragedy for anyone who heard the recording of Boa Sr singing on the radio this morning. Linguists believe disappearance of a language represents the passing into nothingness of a culture, evolved over thousands of years, complete with games, fables and folk songs that will never be heard again. Records of some of them will continue to live of course, but in libraries, or as MP3s, or on microfiche: not as lived experience. According to Sapir-Whorf hypothesis the language we speak determines the way we think. If that were the case, you'd worry that each language extinction might mean the loss of a unique way of seeing the world. If we believe this, we can conclude when the last speaker of a language dies, a language dies, and when a language dies, a world will die. True/ False 45.
